After this extremely influential experience, he began exploring his own unconscious symbolism, the result of which is visible in his work Male and Female which shows freely poured pigment for the first time. The brilliance in the poured paintings that he began from 1947 was that he chose numbers for their titles, widening the viewers' scope by giving them freedom of interpretation, which he thought was limited otherwise. At the age of 44, Pollock passed away in a car accident; he was driving under the influence of alcohol.

Pollock's One (Number 31) is one of his abstract works that he painted using the 'drip technique'. The canvas is covered with long patchy, free flowing irregular lines; the color scheme is very subtle, consisting of only black, blue, grey, brown and white on an off white background; the beauty of Abstract Expressionism is that it does not make a statement of its own, rather it involves the observer's subconscious, allowing them to interpret it the way they see it and how it makes them feel (Lanchner & Pollock, 33). However, keeping in mind the post world war era it was created in, one can imagine the chaos and pandemonium of that time and relate to it; it makes one wonder what it must have been like to live amidst all the destruction and bloodshed. On a closer look, one might feel like the black strokes represent moving, perhaps dancing or falling (after being shot, maybe?) stick men like figures; or figures who are trying to run away from the brown, blue, white and grey (the war, maybe, trying to save themselves?). Also, each color might have a meaning of its own: for instance, the brown (earth or ground), the white (people's tears), the black (arms and ammunition). It is a good thing it does not have a decipherable image(s) with definite meaning. It is a thought-provocative piece of art, and it leaves one with no doubt as to why the art critic, Clement Greenberg wrote, "and I knew Jackson was the greatest painter this country had produced" about Pollock, who played a great role in
